

High School Hopefuls!

Jr. High students have their own little world. The seventh graders are the "freshmen" of WJHS; the eighth graders are the "seniors". Together they make up their own little world. They have their own teachers that don't teach anyone else. They have the whole bottom half of the school to themselves. They have their own sports to prove their ability. Than the people who don't do athletics have their own UIL events in to which participate.

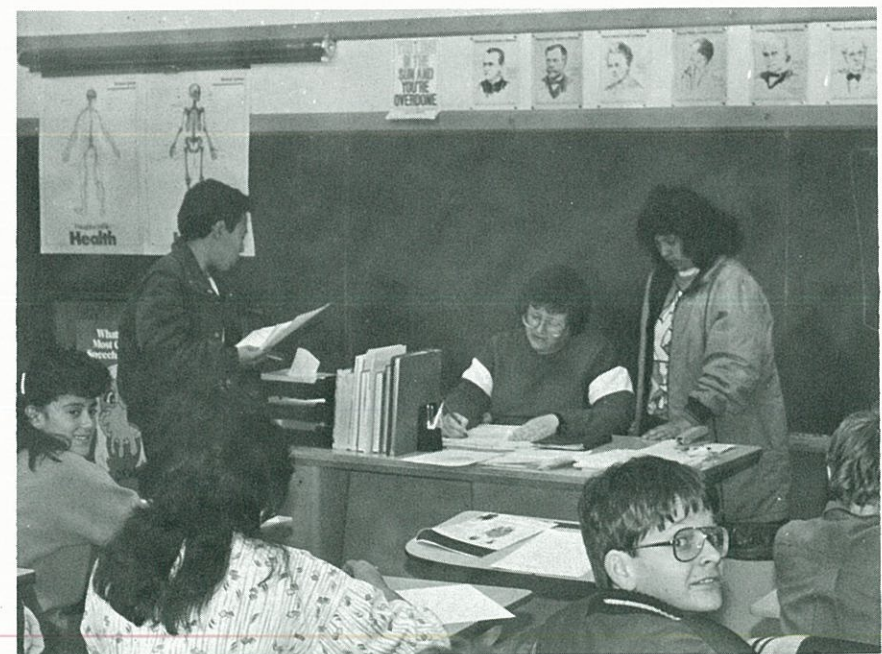

On the other hand, they don't have their own principal like most independant jr. high schools. Most jr. high schools are not anywhere around their home town high schools.

The closeness of the Wink Jr. High students to the Wink High School students has an advantage. This closeness helps in the transition from being jr. high students to becoming high school students. There is also a disadvantage. The jr. high students don't have their own private little campus away from the high school students. They really don't get to feel they are the big shots of school until they're in high school. Now they are our high school hopefuls!

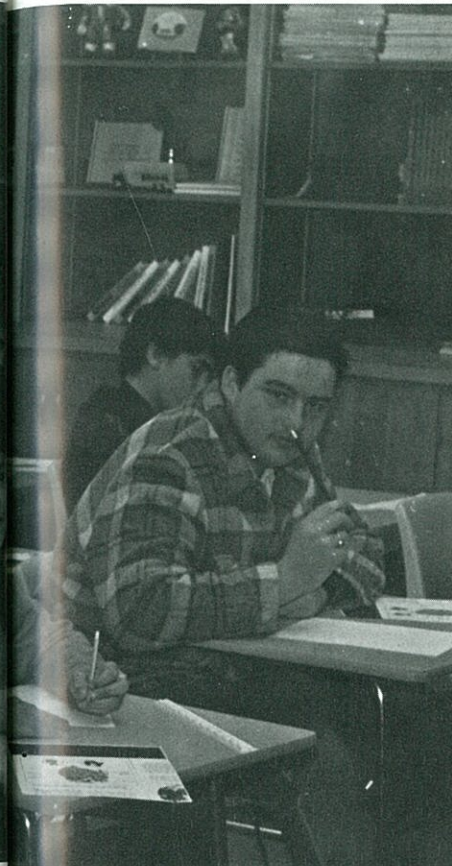

Billy Plunkett seems to be sleeping more than anything else. Ms. Stephens must have been talking about something real boring.

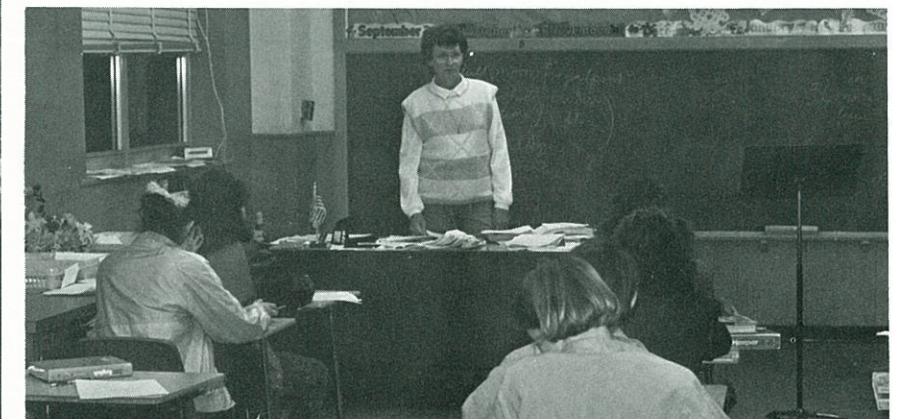

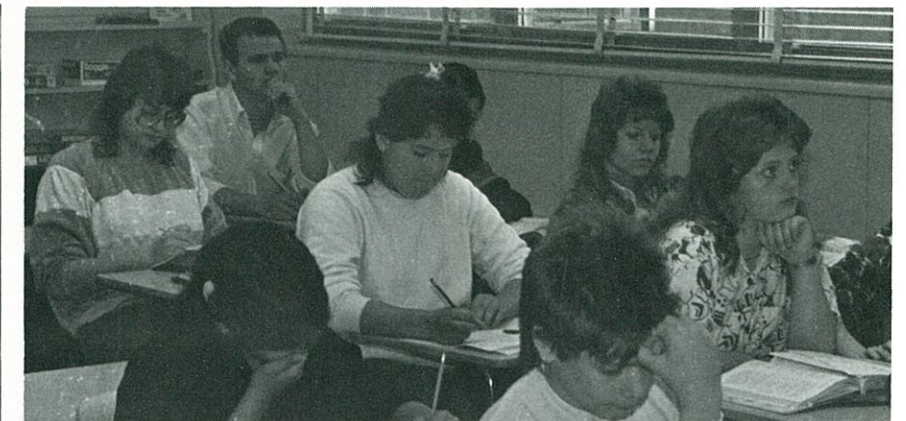

Ms. Dodd teaches her health class about the different bones of the body. The class had to learn to name each bone.

Jessica doesn't seem to be interested in her class work. She had to have been day dreaming about her favorite rock star.

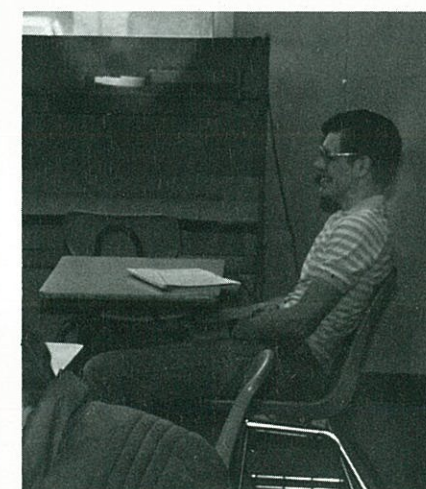

Cindy Ogle is really paying attention to Mrs. Horner. Math had to be very rewarding that day.

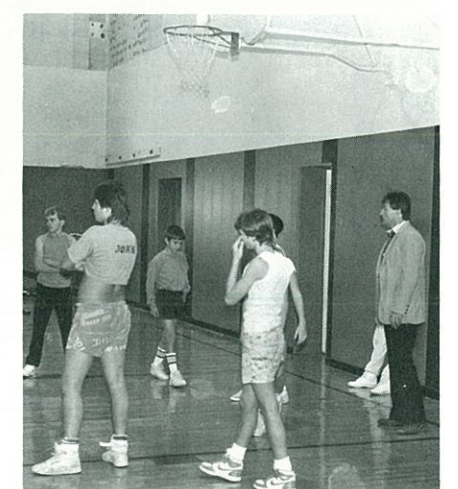

Mrs. Turnbo has got the eyes of her 7th grade language arts class. They all seem to be paying attention, but were they really?

Watch your prepositions! The 7th grade language arts class begins the basics of grammar. Jr. high language arts classes prepare students for high school english.

Robert Watson got in the act. He was being a little camera shy, but he still let out a smile.

Coach Terry Hill is teaching the jr. high boys the fundamentals of basketball. Look again, it seemed they must have been teaching him!
